

Join us for a panel discussion on

RELIGION AND THE 2006 MIDTERM ELECTIONS

What role will religion and moral values play in the upcoming and highly contested midterm elections? Will the first Muslim be elected to Congress? How will Catholic politicians fare? What issues—the economy, Iraq, terrorism, immigration—will prove most salient to voters, many of whom think our government needs a change? Our panelists will analyze the results of the elections from both left and right political perspectives once the votes have been counted. Join us on November 9th for a lively discussion about where the U. S. will go from here.

Featuring:

ALAN WOLFE, Professor of Political Science and Director of the Boisi Center for Religion and American Public Life at Boston College

DANIEL J. MAHONEY, Professor of Political Science at Assumption College in Worcester, MA

MICHAEL TOMASKY, Executive Editor of The American Prospect

November 9, 2006

6:00-7:30 p.m.

Gasson Hall, Room 305

Boston College Chestnut Hill Campus

Sponsored by the Boisi Center for Religion and American Public Life
For more information, call 617-552-1860, e-mail publife@bc.edu or visit www.bc.edu/boisi